A regular household circuit might create high voltage DC and could be dangerous for users if misused. On the other hand, a lightning strike can easily damage a household circuit if placed too close to it or connected to it. Is a lightning strike inherently dangerous, or is it the type of lightning strike that the incident occurred? A: No, a lightning strike can be extremely safe, especially considering that most lightning strikes are not directed at people. If you read the Wikipedia article on lightning safety, you'll see safety guidelines for a large amount of what your household circuit is exposed to. Some of it is basic physics (in some cases), some is common sense (not touching water or metal objects), and some depends on how close the lightning hit to you (less chance of electrocution if it hits farther away). A: The only time a lightning strike would be dangerous is if it comes close enough to the circuit to cause high current to flow through it which would result in a fire. If a lightning strike were to strike the transformer in a flashlight (say), it could result in a short circuit which would destroy the flashlight. It's pretty unlikely that a flash flood would be the result of a lightning strike but it could happen. Factors Associated with Home Parenteral Nutrition in Patients With Advanced Gastrointestinal Cancer. Patients with advanced gastrointestinal cancer often are malnourished and at risk for home parenteral nutrition (HPN). The objective of this study was to describe the patterns of HPN use in advanced gastrointestinal cancer in a large, single center experience. The study is a retrospective review of clinic records of patients who received HPN in the Comprehensive Cancer Center of Wake Forest Baptist Health for advanced gastrointestinal cancer. The effects of age, gender, body mass index, comorbidities, Eastern Cooperative Oncology Group performance status, primary tumor location, diagnosis, and reason for nutrition support on the likelihood of receiving HPN were analyzed by logistic regression. The study included 142 patients. The most common malignancies were pancreatic (32.2%), colon (22.5%), and liver (50b96ab0b6

I have just read the following in a newspaper in the UK: The therapist seems to be struggling Can I use "the therapist seems to be struggling" to mean "the therapist appears to be struggling"? Is there an equivalent sentence that I could use instead of "the therapist seems to be struggling"? A: It's fine to use "seems" this way, but if you're speaking about someone with more authority than you, and assuming they're conscious, you should add the preposition "to". The therapist seems to be struggling. The therapist seems to be to struggling. In both cases, it's a fairly mild statement. The second form is generally used when speaking about something you've been told by someone else. I asked the therapist if they were struggling, and they said they were, and so on. Q: How to have a disabled icon for key navigation through settings? Good day. I am using the following code to create a good keyboard navigation for my list of items : function enableKeyNavigation() { var node = document.getElementById('list');
